For over thirty years, THEATRE THREE has been presenting educational touring programs in schools across Long Island as well as the tri-state area.

These have been the major works:

And These, Our Friends, an anti-DWI program focusing on grades seven through twelve first appeared in the fall of 1989; it continued for over twenty-years before it was put on hiatus and reconceived as a safe-choices production. The play was filmed in 1991 by the AAA Foundation.

Since 1996, From the Fires: Voices of the Holocaust has played over 500 performances in schools, community centers, libraries, synagogues, and churches from as far south as Washington, D.C., to outside of Toronto.

In 2007, Class Dismissed: The Bullying Project, an original musical targeting grades five through eight, debuted.

In the spring of 2014, this program has been joined by Stand Up! Stand Out! The Bullying Project, an original musical aimed at Kindergarten through fourth grade.

Overview.

This is the story of Peg who witnesses the bullying of Nellie and how she comes to terms with her responsibility. Peg, like so many bystanders, is faced with the choice of standing up for Nellie or standing by. The aim of the play is to make our young people aware that doing nothing is doing something.

Stand Up! Stand Out! is specifically Peg’s story—the journey of an individual taking responsibility beyond herself. Peg discovers different ways that she can help Nellie without getting herself or others into trouble. The difference, as one teacher explained, between tattling and telling is that tattling is to get someone into trouble and telling is to get someone out of trouble.

In addition, the play outlines four different types of bullying:

1. Name calling and teasing;
2. Social isolation
3. Threatening
4. Physical bullying.

[We have specifically chosen not to address Cyber Bullying in this production given the target ages of the students.]

Each type of bullying is highlighted through the telling of a famous children’s story.

Synopsis

At Harrison Corner School, Nellie is bullied by Queen Bee Olivia as well as two rather rambunctious boys, Tyler and Jayden. Peg witnesses various taunts, including being left out of the games the children play on the playground and being the only girl in class not invited to Olivia’s birthday party. The bullying builds to the theft of Nellie’s doll (later revealed to be a gift from her grandmother before Nellie’s family moved). Peg ends up with Nellie’s doll but is too uncomfortable to give it back to Nellie in front of the entire class. She puts it in her backpack and forgets about it.

Under the direction of teacher Mrs. Cotton, the class is working on projects based on famous children’s stories. Each student has selected a different tale from which to create his or her piece:

Olivia:	Cinderella
Jayden:	The Three Little Pigs
Tyler:	The Wizard of Oz
Peg:	Alice in Wonderland
Nellie:	unsure

After witnessing additional bullying on the bus, Peg goes home and begins to work on her project. When she takes out her book, she finds Nellie’s doll which reminds her of her failure to act: “What could I say to them? They’re my friends. Besides, we’re all just kidding, right?”

While reading the beginning of Alice in Wonderland, she falls asleep. In her dream, she is joined by a larger and puppet version of Nellie’s Doll—the Doll Puppet. The Doll Puppet becomes her guide in this dream world.

In this strange land, characters from the class' stories come to life in new contexts. Here, Peg is on the receiving end of bullying as shown in these archetypal tales. In these vignettes, Peg experiences types of bullying; after each confrontation, she gains more knowledge and understanding of what Nellie goes through each day.

Cinderella. Bullying type: Threatening. As Cinderella dressing her stepsisters for the ball, she is threatened into helping them and told of dire consequences if she tells of these threats. Additional elements of teasing and social isolation/exclusion are also part of this story.

Alice in Wonderland. Bullying type: Social isolation/exclusion. As Alice, Peg is told by the Mad Hatter, the March Hare, and the Dormouse that even though there is a seat at the table there is no seat for her. Further emphasis is placed on passing judgments on people whom we don't know.

The Three Little Pigs. Bullying type: Physical harm. As the Hay Pig, Peg is abandoned by her Stick and Brick siblings in the face of the impending harm caused by the Big Bad Wolf. Her brother and sister will not get involved for fear of being seen as friendly towards and therefore possibly being hurt themselves.

The Wizard of Oz. Bullying type: Name calling and teasing. Joining her compatriots the Scarecrow, the Lion, and the Tin Man, Peg as Dorothy is confronted by the very nasty Wicked Witch (in this case not “of the West” but “of your worst fears”). The Witch's taunts aim at the friends' deepest fears and weakness (no heart, no brains, no courage). Finally, it is here that Peg stands up for her friends. She has come to an understanding about the various kinds and dangers of bullying.

With these lessons in her mind and heart, she awakens and knows what she must do. The next day, in full view of the other children, she returns the doll to Nellie and finds out a little about the doll. She invites her to join in her project—which is to connect all of the projects with the themes she has learned. In addition, she invites Jayden, Tyler, and Olivia to also join in.

The Style

In addition to dealing with the theme of bullying, Stand Up! Stand Out! is also geared to teach young audiences about live theatre. The presentational nature of the piece—puppets to play the adults as well as only the suggestion of costumes for the fantasy characters—gives the students in the audience an opportunity to use their imaginations. Peg is changed into the various roles—Cinderella, Alice, the Hay Pig, and Dorothy—in full view of the audience. The scenic elements are kept simple. Four benches and a changing flat are the entire set. Other elements are created with simple handheld props (e.g., the Pigs' houses are a small representation of the larger house; the yellow brick road is a piece of fabric dropped in front of the friends, etc.).

The goal is to indoctrinate students into the realm of theatricality as well to stimulate imagination. In an age of film and television that leave nothing to the imagination, this form of theatre relies on the intellectual and emotional participation of the audience to create the environments for itself.

The Songs

An original score has been created for Stand Up! Stand Out!

“A Perfect Day.” Peg and company’s anthem of another wonderful day to read a book, play, and make friends. During this opening number, it is clear that, while she tries Nellie is not part of this “Perfect Day.”

“My Project.” A rap in which the students share the story of their individual projects.

“Cinderella, Better Not Tell-A!” The Stepsisters threaten and torment Cinderella as they are readied for the Ball.

“No Room.” The Mad Hatter, the March Hare, and the Dormouse make it clear to Alice that while there is a seat at the table—there is not room for her.

“Building Our Houses.” The Three Pigs build their houses of hay, stick and brick.

“Big and Bad.” The Big Bad Wolf explains that everyone had better stay out of his way—or suffer the consequences.

“Going Home.” Having learned about the different kinds of bullying and what she can do about them, Peg is ready to return from her dream.

“Stand Up! Stand Out!” [I]. Upon waking, Peg realizes that it is time to do something for Nellie.

“Stand Up! Stand Out!” [II]. In the finale, the entire company sings of how we must join together—that we must make “I” become “We.”
